The MA programme in Language and Culture is designed to develop students' competence and practical skills in English language communication in intercultural contexts. Courses incorporate innovative, comparative, and interdisciplinary approaches; they cover various fields from English and American studies such as linguistics, literary and cultural studies, film studies, gender studies, popular culture, digital culture, and others. The programme prepares students to work with different types of discourses and texts (literary, visual, digital, performative, and graphic) as well as multimodal products for the digital and social media).

We target Bachelors of Arts in philology, as well as in other fields of knowledge, who have a high competence in English (level C1 of the European Language Framework) and wish to build a career in various social domains requiring expertise in English language and culture such as TEFL, consultancy on language, applied linguistics, British/American cultures, journalism, translation, international relations, publishing, and project development.

The three-semester programme is structured in a flexible manner: students can choose courses according to their needs and interests. Non-philology graduates are offered an induction semester which will enable them to acquire the basic competences needed for the main course of study. Some courses are available in e-format so that students can organize their own flexible study programme.

All instruction in the programme is in English. This makes it suitable for international students, too. Student exchange with other European universities via the ERASMUS+ program is also available. All applicants will be invited for an interview conducted in English. Non-philology graduates are also required to submit a Letter of Intent (max. 2 pages, written in English). Selection is based on the following criteria: level of English proficiency, communicative performance, general knowledge of contemporary trends in the humanities as well as relevance of the selected field of study for the candidate's professional or research needs.
